MITIGATING THE IMPACTS OF THE SYRIAN CIVIL WAR

TSINGHUA INTERNATIONAL SCHOOL

UNSC BACKGROUND GUIDE

Topic: Mitigating the Impacts of the Syrian Civil War

Statement of Problem

The Syrian Civil War reveals the cascading consequences of unmet aspirations and the fragility of systemic structures. What began as peaceful pro-democracy demonstrations quickly escalated into a devastating conflict fueled by oppressive governance, sectarian tensions, and international interventions. The war has not only displaced millions, fracturing families and communities, but has also left a trail of broken promises for peace and stability, as ceasefires and negotiations falter. This year's conference theme, "Displacements and Discontents: Revisiting Broken Promises," seeks to confront this erosion of security and explore pathways to rebuilding global stability. As delegates, you are tasked with examining the intricate web of internal and external factors driving this crisis, exploring the profound economic, political, and humanitarian ramifications. In the conferencing phase, delegates are expected to propose actionable solutions that address the root causes of civil wars while confronting the multifaceted limitations hindering sustainable resolutions.

Civil War

A civil war is an armed conflict fought between different organized faculties within a single state, territory, or regime. Comparably with interstate wars, civil wars tend to exhibit less severe immediate effects on the parties or victims of their occurrence but establish profound long-term effects such as economic collapse and residential displacement. Moreover, civil wars are often resolved informally, leading to frequent re-occurrences. A civil war may be caused by multifaceted reasons, and the modern theory of analysis took two broad lenses for consideration: inside-out and outside-in. The first examines the interior social structures of a state, territory, or regime and its relation to the initiation of a civil conflict. The latter examines interstate influences on the state during civil conflict and how that participation, collaboration, or interference would deteriorate the issue. Inside-out causes of civil wars mainly include belief divergence, class conflicts, government oppression (tyranny), or economic crisis. In the 1960s to the 1970s, an ethnic revolt against human rights abuse (large-scale deployment) erupted in eastern Zaire (now referred to as the Democratic Republic of Congo) to overthrow the Zairean president Mobutu Sese Seko. The rebels also received support from communist states such as China and the Soviet Union to eventually crush the government.

Syrian Civil War

The Syrian Civil War began in 2011 with the democratic demonstrations against the Ba'ath party broke out. Pro-democracy demonstrators charged the streets and called for an end to the authoritarian practices of the Assad regime, the governing party of the country since 1971 when Hafiz al-Assad became president. The Syrian government suppressed protests with violence, including but not limited to extensive use of police, military, and paramilitary measures. In 2012, the conflict between the democratic protestors and the government opposition ultimately escalated to a full-scale civil war.

The cause of the demonstration will be analyzed from multiple lenses, which will be discussed deliberately in this section. The inside-out theory on the Syrian Civil War claimed that the conflict was caused by the internal disproportion of power within the state of Syria. The Syrian regime, characterized by the over-concentration of power towards a single family, has long raised frustration among democratic proponents in the country. Though Syria is a religiously diverse country, and the cause of the Syrian Civil War was not considered to be division between sects, (Syria has over 7 different religious groups, including Sunnis Muslim, Shi'a Muslims, Alawi, Ismaili, Twelver Imami, Druze, Jews, and Christians) the Ba'ath party consist mostly of Alawi and underrepresented the large portion of Sunnis Muslims. The imbalance of occupation of power by the al-Assad family monopolized significant national decision powers, where the youngest brother of Bashar al-Assad holds strong financial influence over the country's military forces, and the first cousin of Bashar al-Assad, who was accused as one of the "primary centers of corruption" (the US treasury, 2008) by controls over 60% of the country's economy.

Political Impacts

Since the Syrian civil war broke out in 2011, its political implications have been far-reaching and complex. First, the Syrian government, in the face of initially peaceful protests demanding reform, opted for violent repression, which led to the formation of opposition forces and eventually to a full-scale civil war. This response by the Syrian government, in part due to its leadership's steadfastness and clinging to power, and with strong support from its Allies Iran and Russia, has allowed the Assad regime to remain militarily strong and gradually regain lost ground.

Regional geopolitics have also played a major role in Syria's civil war. Iran and Russia's support for the Assad regime has been pitted against support for the opposition from countries such as Saudi Arabia, Turkey, and Qatar. The intervention of such regional forces not only intensifies the conflict within Syria but also makes Syria the focus of the regional power game. For example, the initial strong criticism and sanctions by the United States and Western countries against the Assad regime, and the later strikes against ISIS, have affected the course of the Syrian civil war to varying degrees.

The political impact of the Syrian civil war can also be seen in its impact on neighboring countries. For example, neighboring countries such as Turkey and Lebanon have faced an influx of refugees from Syria, which has put pressure on the socio-economic and political stability of these countries. At the same time, the Syrian civil war has exacerbated sectarian tensions in the region, especially between Sunnis and Shiites.

Economic Effects

Since 2011, the war has resulted in a large number of casualties and property damage, and it is estimated that by the end of 2016, the war in Syria had caused up to $226 billion in economic damage to the country in a variety of sectors (World Bank Open Data, 2017), including agriculture, the energy industry, real estate, transportation, water supply systems, the healthcare industry, and the education sector. In addition, Syria's infrastructure has suffered severe damage, with direct losses amounting to $75 billion, especially in the war's core areas such as Aleppo, Daraa, Hama, Homs, Idlib, and Latakia.

The Syrian currency has been severely devalued, unemployment has surged, inflation has soared and the standard of living of the population has fallen severely. Poverty in Syria accounts for 85.2% of the total population, with many living in extreme poverty, and the school dropout rate for minors is over 50%. The Syrian Government's fiscal deficit is huge, the size of its external debt is expanding year by year, and its foreign exchange reserves are decreasing sharply, resulting in a serious shortage of funds for reconstruction. It is estimated that the reconstruction of Syria will require as much as 1 trillion dollars (World Bank Open Data, 2017), which is undoubtedly an astronomical figure for Syria at the beginning of the war and is in urgent need of external international investment and assistance.

Syria has a huge refugee population, with about 11 million Syrians fleeing their homes, 6 millions of whom have become international refugees. This not only puts enormous socio-economic and security pressures on Syria domestically but also on neighboring countries and European countries who are hosting Syrian refugees. Although the Syrian government has repeatedly emphasized that “allies” such as Iran, Russia, and China will enjoy “priority” in post-war economic reconstruction. However, the huge gap in reconstruction funds makes it difficult to carry out large-scale economic reconstruction in a short time.

The Syrian civil war has had profound political and economic repercussions, reshaping the nation's governance and infrastructure. Politically, it has led to a protracted conflict with global geopolitical implications, involving major powers and regional actors. Economically, the war has devastated Syria's economy, causing widespread destruction of infrastructure, skyrocketing unemployment, and severe poverty. Delegates of the United Nations Security Council are expected to play a crucial role in facilitating peace talks, providing humanitarian aid, and supporting Syria's reconstruction efforts during the conference. Delegates are also encouraged to dive into the deep, complex causation of the Syrian Civil War.

History of the Problem

The Rise of the Syrian Civil War

In the year 2011, Europe saw the “Arab Springs”, a series of anti-government protests that spread through many parts of the Arab, and Syria was no different. In February of 2011, several small demonstrations were held to call for reform of democracy and to show agreements with pro-democracy protesters in other European countries.

At the time, Syria was a non-democratic country, and their president Basha al-Assad (2000-) was the successor after his father and former president, Hafez al-Assad, died. The al-Assad family has been ruling Syria for more than 50 years, and problems were rising. High unemployment rates, widespread corruption and a lack of political freedom (ShelterBox) were all problems that the Syrian government faces, and its citizens were not happy about it. In March of 2011, peaceful demonstrations began in the streets of Syria, but they were met by harsh movements of the government, which included the government to have the military start shooting at the protestors. According to Aljazeera news, 15 children were arrested for graffities in support of the Arab Springs. Amongst them, a 13-year-old was killed after being brutally tortured. This event basically marked the beginning of the conflict, and ever since then, the land of Syria has erupted into a never-ending crisis.

Political standpoints of the war

The Syrian civil war was split among four major parties with different backers during the war: Al-Assad, the Kurds which were the Syrian troops, Syrian civilians as the rebels, and ISIS, the terrorist organization. These four parties are then backed up by a series of different countries and political figures, each with their own goals and intention. For example, the United States of America was a major ally with the rebels, but its intention was mainly to counter against ISIS, while countries like Iran, Russia, and gulf countries funded and backed up Al-Assad with military weapons. ISIS introduced themselves into the Syrian War in 2013 by establishing "Islamic State in Iraq and al-Sham" (ISIS) in Syria, which then caused countries like the United States to directly participate in the conflict too.

Towards the early stages of the war, the United States, under former president Barack Obama's rule, launched a secret order to the CIA in training and equipping the rebels with relevant knowledge in an attempt to decline the death tolls of the conflict. However, this move was ultimately stalled and unsuccessful. In August of 2013, Al-Assad launched a series of chemical weapons against his own civilians for the first time, leading to thousands of people dying from poisonous gas. Barack Obama and the United States immediately reacted to the incident, saying that the country "will react to the use of chemical weapons by the Syrian Government", which was announced by Barack Obama in a speech at the white house. This forced the Syrian government to surrender its chemical weapons to the international community just three days later to avoid a military strike by the United States, and the United States later backed down.

The United States was not the only key player in this conflict amongst the Big Five of the UNSC. In 2015, Russia began to take a much more active role in the Syrian Civil War. Not only did the Russian government start deploying troops and military equipment to the Syrian airbase located near Latakia, but in September 2015, Russia launched its first airstrikes to Syria. Although the country later claims to have been targeting ISIS, the aftermath of the airstrikes proves that they have been targeting the rebels which were fighting against Al-Assad. Then, in 2016, the Russian and Syrian Government launched another series of bombing campaign to the rebels in the eastern side of Aleppo, and in this incident, the two countries made no attempt in avoiding any civilian casualties, resulting in a great loss of the medical facilities and search and rescue teams there, and the lives of more than 100 civilians. Despite the international human rights organization's harsh condemns on their actions, both Russia and Syria had no response until the rebel groups in Aleppo collapsed in December 2016, a near 4 months since the first bombing campaign started.

Then, in April 2017, the Syrian government launched another series of chemical weapon attacks in Khan Sheikhoun. This attack resulted in roughly 80 deaths and hundreds of injuries, including many children and women. While Al-Assad denied all responsibilities for the attack, the government was still put under thorough investigation, and evidence has pointed out that Al-Assad was likely the perpetrator. Former United States president Donald Trump at the time also responded to the attack with a targeted military strike on the Shayrat Airbase in Syria on April 7, 2017, which was carried out as a measure against the Syrian government for its acts of using chemical weapons against civilians. In addition, countries like Turkey and Iran have also participated in the war in these periods, with Turkey supporting the anti-Al-Assad regime forces along with American allies, while Iran supported the pro-Assad Syrian forces alongside with Russia.

Peace Talk Attempts of the Syrian Civil War

Several active negotiations and tentative ceasefire period had been established throughout the on-going conflict, yet none were permanently promised. This long held peace talk period started as early as 2012, according to the United Nations. The very initial peace talk was initiated by Kofi Annan, previous United Nations Secretary General as part of Kofi Annan's six-point peace plan. It was accepted by President Al-Assad then, but ultimately this ceasefire did not last long, and peace talks around the conflict soon continued. Over the past decade, multiple peace talks revolving this conflict have been initiated, with the most well-influenced ones being the Geneva talk. This peace talk was initiated as early as 2015, then it was able to put into action resolution 2254 in the security council which looked into changing the government system and starting democratic election systems. (GenevaSolutions.news) However, the peace talk hosted in 2017 failed to bring the two sides together, and Syria ultimately backed out of the Geneva constitution talks. Since then, the United Nations has seen difficulties in ushering Syria into peaceful negotiations despite its urgency to the country and its leaders.

Over the past 13 years, over half a million people were killed in the war including over 250 thousand civilians, leaving more than 7 million civilians displaced. Despite a ceasefire since March 2020, there have been sporadic conflicts that are still on going in the country, and the core of the conflict has not been resolved yet. (GenevaSolutions.news) As of today, how the war will progress still remains unknown, but analysts have said that permanent political resolution for the war-torn country remains elusive. Past Actions

During the Syrian Civil War, numerous groups have taken significant actions to address the humanitarian crisis and support affected populations. The United Nations (UN) has been a key player, alongside various other organizations including International Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs), PAX, Human Rights Organizations, and Interfaith and Religious Organizations. These groups have collectively contributed to alleviating the suffering caused by the conflict.

UN Past Actions

The United Nations, through its specialized agencies such as UNICEF, UNHCR, and the World Food Program, has played a crucial role in providing humanitarian aid to millions of Syrians affected by the conflict. This aid includes essential supplies like food, clean water, and medical care. Additionally, the UN has been at the forefront of coordinating international efforts to support Syrian refugees, ensuring they receive protection, assistance, and resettlement opportunities. The UNHCR has been instrumental in working with host countries in the region to manage the influx of refugees and provide them with the necessary support to rebuild their lives. UNICEF and its partners persist in their efforts to safeguard children and assist them in dealing with the consequences of conflict. This encompasses enhancing psychosocial support to aid children and caregivers in recovering from trauma, while also providing vital assistance and services to address the physical and psychological challenges faced by children. The World Food Program predicted, at the end of the food-assistance program it will affect the 3.2 million people (about the population of Arkansas) who continued to receive this support after July 2023, when WFP had to reduce its caseload from 5.5 million (also because of funding shortfalls).

International Organization Past Actions

Various other organizations have also been actively involved in addressing the crisis. International Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) have provided on-the-ground assistance, ranging from medical aid to educational programs for displaced children. PAX, a peace organization, has been involved in advocating for peace and justice, documenting human rights violations, and promoting dialogue among conflicting parties, work on redeveloping the social contract locally. Human Rights Organizations have focused on monitoring and reporting abuses and advocating for accountability and justice for victims. Interfaith and Religious Organizations have contributed by promoting peace and reconciliation, providing humanitarian aid, and supporting the spiritual and psychological needs of those affected by the war. These collective efforts have been crucial in addressing the multifaceted challenges posed by the Syrian Civil War.

Possible Solutions

The Syrian Civil War had created lasting shadows among the citizens. Thus, there is various solutions to cease the violence of the Syrian Civil War. As one may know, the Syrian War had created numerous deaths and injuries (children, women, elderlies). Moreover, not only is the war disintegrating the country, but the earthquakes had also led to massive destructions. The huge numbers of deaths and injuries can lead to the fall of society. Given more time, the UNSC can endow the citizens with medical aid. These are immediate solutions to protect the citizens from all the chaos. Furthermore, expanded communication among different nations is crucial in helping the civilians and the country. According to UN, there is long term solutions to solve the problem, "All stakeholders must show the determination to continue pursuing lasting peace for the Syrian people to rebuild their devastated lives."

Moreover, earthquakes are inevitable. However, there are possible solutions to tackle this drawback. As one may know, earthquakes has dropped the economy of Syria and created devastating situations for the country. Citizens had suffered. It has continuously remained a severe problem in society. Therefore, there needs to be solutions targeted on this problem. For instance, providing citizens with earthquake warnings and free aid after every massive earthquake. There can be professionals to study effective earthquake warnings and refuge during and after earthquakes. UNSC would provide every district/block with an "assisting team" with experts and trained security officers to help civilians after earthquakes.

Additionally, enhancing education and healthcare for children is essential. Lack of education for the children has proved to be a serious problem (concern) lurking within the nation. "It is our collective responsibility to reaffirm to children that their future is our priority too." --UN. There are feasible solutions to solve this problem. Investing in rebuilding schools and universities is crucial for Syria's long-term recovery. This includes providing resources and training for teachers and ensuring access to education for all children and young adults.

Finally, strengthening local governance structures and supporting civil society organizations can help rebuild trust. Local councils and community leaders can play a vital role in delivering services

Possible Stances

United States of America

The United States of America is vehemently against President Assad's ideologies and reign, open about the fact that they want him out of the government. The United States of America supports non-extremist rebels in their rebellion campaigns. In contrast to other countries, the United States of America's approach to providing aid is much neutralized and moderate despite their clearly stated stance. In the early stages of engaging in the war, the United States of America focused on supporting the political transition from Assad to a democratic government, assisting groups of non-extreme rebels with resources and training programs. Later, the United States of America's focus shifted to battling terrorism, participating in certain air strikes that target terrorist groups. Therefore, when it comes to the discussion of the Syrian civil war, the United States of America should discuss ways to effectively aid the Syrian refugees and rebels as well as ways to address the current governing body of Syria.

Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Persian Gulf Allies

These countries are extremely against President Assad's stance and key supporters of the Syrian opposition. These countries are major providers of military and financial assistance to several rebel groups, with Turkey hosting over two million displaced Syrian refugees in its own country and Saudi Arabia has called for no-conflict zones to protect civilians. Therefore, when it comes to the discussion of the Syrian civil war, these countries should discuss effective strategies to assist the Syrian rebels in overturning the current Syrian government and to offer military and financial assistance and resources to the rebels and refugees.

Iran, Russia

These countries are major supports of the Syrian government and President Assad. Russia is a long-time ally of Syria's president and supplies weapons and military forces to the Syrian government. Furthermore, Russia took part in participating in numerous air strikes that targeted the rebels. Iran is believed to be spending billions of dollars each year to provide resources to Assad, including military advisers and weapons, serving as a critical transit point for Iranian weapon shipments to Syria. Therefore, when it comes to the discussion of the Syrian civil war, these countries should discuss effective strategies to assist the Syrian government and President Assad stabilizing the government and battling the rebels, as well as offering assistance and aid to the Syrian government.
